AT A TURNING POINT

KEY POINTS

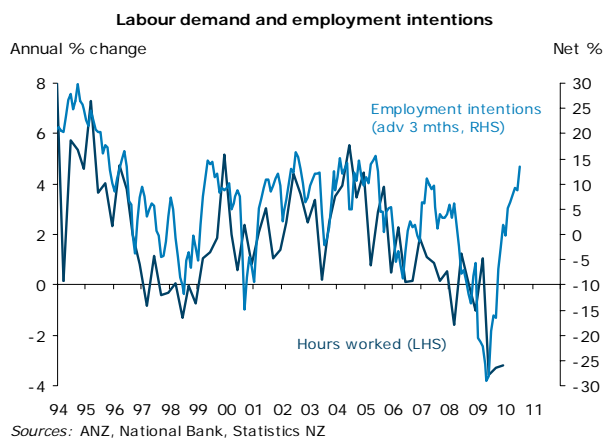

- We expect a 0.2 percent quarterly rise in HLFS employment in March, following four consecutive quarterly declines. Quarterly HLFS outturns of late have been volatile, so there are wider than normal margins or error around these forecasts.
- The unemployment rate is expected to ease to 7.1 percent. March quarter figures released by Statistics New Zealand showed surprisingly weak growth in the working age population. As such, it will not take much employment growth to see the unemployment rate fall (although we note the participation rate is also a major swing factor).
- Wage growth is expected to remain contained. The key for the RBNZ will be the wage outlook when the labour market recovery strengthens from later this year.
- Given the inherent volatility in quarterly readings in the HLFS, it's hard to place too much weight on outturns. Nonetheless, it will be hard to go against the spirit of a falling unemployment rate (if it does manifest) in terms of the implications for monetary policy.

DATA PREVIEW

The labour market is expected to be at a turning point. We expect employment to register a 0.2 percent quarterly increase in March, which follows a period of four consecutive quarterly declines over 2009. Hours worked are expected to increase by 0.7 percent in the quarter, the first quarterly increase in nearly two years. This fits with recent labour market indicators. The improvement in employment intentions from the latest business confidence survey, and job ads, are all pointing to a pick-up in employment growth.

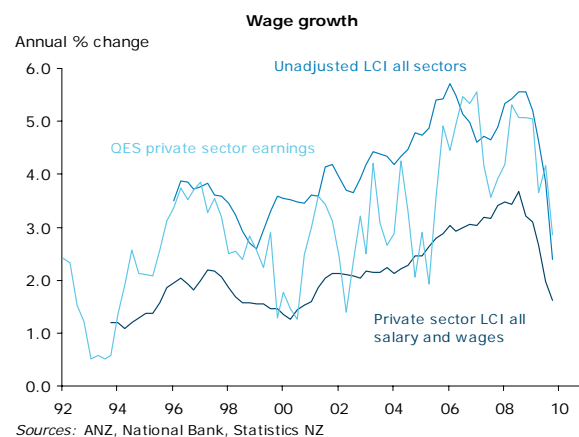

The flexibility of the domestic labour market in this downturn has been evident, with wage growth and hours worked per employee dropping to multi-year lows. In the absence of such an adjustment, the unemployment rate would be considerably higher than it is now. However, a consequence of this flexibility is that the subsequent recovery in labour demand is likely to be less employment-rich than in previous cyclical recoveries. We expect the improvement in employment to lag that of hours worked for some time yet. With hours worked within the economy around 4 percent below pre-recessionary levels, there is a considerable degree of labour market slack. It will take a prolonged pick-up in the demand for labour for this margin of spare capacity to be eroded.

Typically, subdued employment growth would see the unemployment rate track up slightly with growth in the working age population and labour force typically around 0.3 to 0.4 percent per quarter. Indeed this would fit with official unemployment benefit numbers, which showed a small rise in the March quarter. However, yesterday's published estimates of the March quarter working age population were on the low side, suggesting a mere 5,000 increase from the December quarter in seasonally adjusted terms. This goes against the spirit of solid migration gains and population growth but we'll take the figures as given. It takes out much of the risk of an upside unemployment rate surprise (although the latter is subject to volatility in the participation rate and employment itself). Typically, a rise in the unemployment rate would require a fall in employment, which goes against the recovery evident in labour market indicators. However, it would not take much of an upside surprise to employment growth (or fall in participation) to see the unemployment rate fall by more than the market expects.

Beyond some volatility in the HLFS, we expect wage inflation to depict a subdued picture. Annual private sector LCI inflation is expected to ease to 1.4 percent in the March quarter (0.4 percent quarterly), the lowest in nearly a decade. QES private sector average hourly earnings are also expected to show moderation. Natural lags are partly at play here and we need to recognise this.

Given the inherent volatility in quarterly readings in the HLFS, it's hard to place too much weight on outturns. Nonetheless, it'll be hard to go against the spirit of a falling unemployment rate (if it does manifest) in terms of the implications for monetary policy. Beyond that, an important consideration going forward will be the extent to which the inflation one-offs later this year (ETS, tobacco excise and a prospective hike in GST) will have an effect on price and wage setting behaviour. Wage inflation moderated very quickly in 2009 and the test will be whether the lid will be kept on wage settlements when the labour market recovery strengthens. With considerable slack still evident in the labour market, higher wage inflation is unlikely to be an immediate threat. But in some sectors, capacity constraints are already featuring (e.g. forestry). We are also detecting a wage competition dynamic with Australia in some instances to hold staff in New Zealand.
